ABOUT THE FILM

On November 30, 1999, more than 40,000 people worldwide across the political spectrum, young and old, from union steelworkers to farmers, faith leaders to college students, assembled in downtown Seattle's bustling shopping district with one unified goal in mind: to shut down the World Trade Organization (WTO) ministerial conference and prevent decisions impacting the lives of everyday citizens from being made behind closed doors.

DEFTLY EDITED ARCHIVAL FOOTAGE SHOWS HOW THIS QUICKLY DEVOLVES INTO A GRISLY, VISCERAL SHOWDOWN BETWEEN AN OVER-ARMED POLICE FORCE AND WORKING PEOPLE.

Solely using archival footage, the new documentary film WTO/99 is a chronological breakdown of the events as they occurred in real time over the three-day period that the conference was scheduled to take place. The film is produced in part by PSFC member Debra McClutchy, alongside filmmaking team Ian Bell, Alex Megaro and Laura Tatham. In an article for Filmmaker magazine co-authored by Bell, Megaro, and Tatham, the filmmakers note spending more than two years “living” in the footage of the largest U.S. demonstration on record since the Vietnam War. They combed through nearly one thousand hours of material captured by protestors on the ground as events unfolded.

The demonstrations began as peaceful acts of civil disobedience. The protestors wanted to sound the alarm and have their voices heard over increasing fear of environmental degradation. They were also concerned about the erosion of labor protections leading to more U.S. jobs being offshored, and potential violation of international law.

Deftly edited sequential archival footage obtained from a range of perspectives and sources shows how this quickly devolved into a grisly, visceral showdown between an over-armed police force and working people. This is a chilling foreshadowing of the militarized policing seen more recently in the streets of Ferguson and Minneapolis. As the drama unfolds, audiences are offered glimpses of the representatives of the real perpetrators: the suited, briefcase-carrying negotiators for corporate interests. We see this come to the forefront in the documentary, with Niketown and Starbucks franchises serving as the backdrop for the protests.

Only hours into the first day of the conference, political pressure from the Clinton administration contributed to a series of missteps and wayward decision-making from Seattle Mayor Paul Schell and Police Chief Norm Stamper. They instructed local law enforcement to deploy rubber bullets and tear gas against protestors. Up to that point, demonstrators—through peaceful means—had successfully obstructed delegates from gaining entry to the conference.

In Filmmaker magazine, Bell, Megaro and Tatham recount listening to tapes of police radio communications from that week and being struck by how starkly the recorded narrative diverged from the lived experiences of protestors. They wrote, “we heard officers warning one another of protestors wielding chains and pieces of wood with nails sticking out—the footage shows neither.”

News outlets likewise offer a clouded, often stilted perspective. They chose to focus on covering a small handful of looters who vandalized storefronts, rather than the thousands of peaceful protestors clubbed over the head and pelted in the eye with rubber bullets by officers clad in riot gear.

There are no spoilers here: who prevails and who is defeated during an unprecedented moment in U.S. history is an ongoing point of discussion. It’s a conversation that we need to have in 2026, as all of us bear witness to increasing political unrest and polarization across the nation and worldwide. What the film offers is a moving recreation of events as they unfolded. It invites us to reflect on what was gained and lost, on police overreach in service of interests that don’t reflect the will of the people, the latent power of collective action and what that means for us in the present day.

IN MEMORY OF LINDA FAUST

Linda Faust, a longtime Park Slope resident and Coop member, died of mesothelioma on February 25. She was 77 years old. Linda taught Biology and Earth Science at nearby Clara Barton High School for 30 years at a time when few women taught science in the public school system. She waited to join the Coop until she retired, fearing she would not have enough spare time to fulfill the work requirement. This reflected her all-in commitment to being a teacher. Dr. Brigitte Holder, a former student who became a lifelong friend, recalled:

“The way to describe her was independent, stern and demanding of respect in her classroom. She genuinely wanted to mold you into the best version of you. Her classroom was a learning arena. I couldn’t wait to attend Health Occupation Science because I knew every day I would emerge with a new wealth of knowledge, bringing me closer to becoming a physician.”

When Linda did finally join the Coop, she was on a Receiving Squad, stocking produce in the early morning, before the store opened. The Coop gave her another way to participate in the community she loved. Her friend Judith Foster remembered:

“Linda and I would always ask each other, ‘Need anything from the Coop? I’m going to walk over there soon.’ She really liked the coffee, SodaStream, the lox, and the maple yogurt. She saw the Coop as part of communal Park Slope life and felt strongly that it belonged to everyone who worked there, not just those with a particular point of view.”

Linda and her husband Steve were instrumental in improving bike access to the Coop. The bike valet system was largely the result of their efforts. After Steve’s death in 2014, she continued to advocate for easier and safer bike access, feeling that bicycles were integral to the fabric of the city. In her retirement, she frequented the Brooklyn Botanic Garden and museums all over the city. She also took great pride in the achievements of her three grandsons.

Dr. Holder emphasized how Linda’s instruction extended far beyond the classroom, even during her final illness:

“Until the last minute of her life, she remained the consummate teacher, now teaching me a life lesson. I watched her while she lay in hospice, gracefully making all decisions along with her family on how she would pass on her own terms, without tubes and medical devices.”

Linda is survived by her daughter Juliette Faust Kennedy, son Nathan Faust, son-in-law Terence Kennedy, daughter-in-law Tamarah Faust, grandsons Eli, Miles and Seamus and sister Estelle Roca.
